Manager Commentary

Markets continued where they left off in January, falling further to reach their nadir by mid- February. Despite the range of asymmetric risks still on the table, global equity markets climbed off the lows to finish strong. The S&P 500 was only down 0.41% whilst its European counterpart the Euro Stoxx lost 3.26%. One year on, the Euro soared back to levels seen before the ECB's own QE began, raising more questions about the efficacy of central bank action in the current climate.

In Europe, the ECB minutes revealed that the governing council was unanimous in reviewing and possible reconsidering its stance on current monetary policy in its March meeting. This buoyed markets, with now a growing expectation that Mario Draghi must deliver an expansion to his asset purchase program and cut rates yet further-going deeper into negative interest rate territory. We already saw that the Riksbank cut rates further during February. Yields in the Bund, much like the US 10yr, continued to fall even as equity markets rallied as a result of the NIRP being pursued by central banks supporting bond markets. Our exposure to the European banking sector hurt us in February as fears about their on-going restructuring saw shares prices tumble for even the biggest names including Germany's bell weather Deutsche Bank.

In the US, jobs data underwhelmed as only 151,000 payrolls were added, well below the 190,000 consensus. However, unemployment fell to 4.9% as the participation rate continues to fall. The question now being asked of The Fed is will they reverse course on their rate hiking program or risk the US Dollar strengthening yet further against its peers?

Elsewhere, the BOJ's announcement of a negative interest rate saw the trade-weighted value of the Yen head south. But the effects were short lived as investors piled into the supposed 'safe-haven' currency leading to new 15-month highs- trading at a low of 110.99 against the greenback. Our long Yen position has helped provide a hedge for our portfolio in a risk-off environment. Sovereign bonds surged globally and the Japanese benchmark 10-year yield fell below zero for the first time.

In the FX market, Sterling dropped against all its 16 major peers. The pound fell after London Mayor Boris Johnson said he'll campaign for Britain to leave the EU in a June referendum.

The commodity market rout continued going into February as we saw Crude Oil plummet over 20% within the first half of the month reaching the lowest levels seen since 2003. Yet positive supply side dynamics coupled with the news that many of the big OPEC nations were willing to reach a preliminary agreement to freeze production saw it recover with WTI finishing the month down only 4.34%. We are positioned to capitalise as Oil markets look to recover.
